The Saint Louis Art Museum's operations have been impacted by the global pandemic in ways that could not have been imagined just 24 months ago. Yet I am encouraged by how our institution has responded. 2021 was marked by both thoughtful presentations of art in the galleries and robust virtual programs that continue to connect our collection with the diverse communities we serve.

St. Louis Mayor Tishaura Jones, Brent Benjamin,
St. Louis County Executive Same Page

Among the most significant changes at the Museum was a generational leadership change. After 22 years at the helm, Brent Benjamin retired from his role as the Barbara B. Taylor Director on June 30. Among many achievements under Brent's leadership, the Museum significantly enhanced its collection, built a world-class expansion on Art Hill, conducted a record-setting capital campaign, and hosted several of the best-attended exhibitions in the Museum's history.

My appointment as the new Barbara B. Taylor Director came after an extensive international search, guided by recommendations of a months-long listening project that included input from staff, board members, the St. Louis community, and arts leaders on the attributes needed to guide the Museum into its next era. The process identified the need for a director who would steward and champion the Museum and St. Louis, become an active partner in the region's dynamic art community, and serve as an architect for change, with a particular focus on advancing diverse global and cultural discourse in our community. I am honored to have been selected to lead the Museum in achieving these goals while building on the impressive legacy of the directors who came before me.

The pandemic's ongoing impact on international travel and art shipping compelled creativity in our main exhibition presentations in 2021. The Museum's staff worked closely with regional and national arts institutions to present exhibitions drawn from U.S.-based collections that nevertheless advanced international perspectives. The first, Nubia: Treasures of Ancient Africa, offered insights into the long and glorious past of the kingdoms that inhabited what is today the Sudanese Nile Valley. Showcasing jewelry, pottery, sculpture, metalwork, and other objects spanning more than 2,000 years, the exhibition was drawn from the collection of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston and was offered to visitors for an extended sixteen-week run. The Museum's commemoration of Missouri's 200th birthday, Art Along the Rivers: A Bicentennial Celebration, opened in October. This visually stunning exhibition introduced visitors to our region's rich legacy of artistic production and collecting spanning more than 800 years, and demonstrated the outsized role our confluence region has played in the history of North American art-making, and on global interpretations of the Gateway to the West.

The Museum also presented featured installations from contemporary artists whose work supported our goal to advance new narratives about the history of art and attract diverse audiences. Oliver Lee Jackson, on view during the second half of 2021, highlighted 12 paintings, drawings, and prints covering more than five decades of the artist's work. The exhibition allowed viewers to trace the artist's evolution over several decades, demonstrating his significance as a highly experimental artist who works in a range of media. Many of the objects were generously loaned by Donald M. Suggs, a local collector and close friend of the artist.

Currents 120: Jess Dugan presented a selection of recent works – portraits, self-portraits, and still lifes – created for the exhibition by the photographer, known best for their color photographs that explore the power of identity, desire, and connection. Working within a framework of queer experience, Dugan's portraits examine intersections between individual identity and the search for intimate connections with others. Presented during the same period, Damon Davis: All Hands On Deck addressed social justice and the call for change through a series of photographs taken after the 2014 shooting death of Michael Brown in Ferguson. Other key presentations in 2021 included rare Jewish textiles, Southwestern Native American art, architectural photography, figural subjects in Chinese art, video works addressing migration and displacement, modern Japanese military art, and the renovation and reinstallation of the Museum's Oceanic art galleries

Maryanne Ellison Simmons and Ted Simmons

The year was also notable for the growth of the Museum's Romare Bearden Graduate Museum Fellowship, a nearly 30-year program that has been hailed as a national model. Named to honor African American artist Romare Bearden, the fellowship aims to build a pool of outstanding and talented museum professionals from historically underrepresented backgrounds. In 2021, the program was expanded to support two fellows per year, each for a two-year term. To celebrate the expansion, the Museum launched an endowment fundraising campaign, anchored by a significant donation from Colin and Emily Frost, and the Frost Family. A national diversity summit "Advancing Change: The Future of Museum Leadership," has presented this day-long virtual event featuring participation from many former Bearden Fellows, as well as leaders in the field from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, the Studio Museum in Harlem, and the American Alliance of Museums, among others. Fundraising efforts to fully fund the Bearden Endowment are ongoing.

Last year, the Museum announced the promised gift of 22 masterworks from Emily Rauh Pulitzer, an art historian and public-spirited donor whose philanthropy has elevated the collection and enriched the St. Louis community. Comprised primarily of paintings and sculpture by 20th-century European and American artists, the promised works are an art historical primer reflecting Mrs. Pulitzer's background as a former curator at the Museum, as well as her deep knowledge and intimate familiarity with the collection. The works fill critical gaps, reinforce areas of depth, and create dialogue with other works in the collection – including with those that are among the 144 works of art previously given by her; her late husband, Joseph Pulitzer Jr.; and his first wife, Louise Vauclain Pulitzer.

Also instrumental in expanding the Museum’s collection was the partial gift and partial purchase of a collection of 833 works of contemporary art assembled by Ted and Maryanne Ellison Simmons, passionate and thoughtful collectors whose generosity has significantly deepened the Museum’s holding of contemporary American prints. Additionally, the Museum acquired a stoneware storage jar made by David Drake, a master ceramicist who, despite his enslavement, was literate and signed his vessels. The acquisition allowed us to present an expanded history of American art, and to expand our collection of works by diverse artists.

Although Museum attendance in 2021 grew to 60% of pre-pandemic levels, with more than 320,000 patrons visiting in person, capacity limits and safety protocols continued to compel the suspension of most in-person events throughout 2021. However, many digital programs were initiated or extended to keep patrons engaged and help them forge deeper connections to the collection. These programs included Art Speaks, deep-dive talks about collection works; Art Quest, a guided video series for family audiences that promotes exploration and art-making; SLAM in 60, a video series offering minute-long immersions into current projects and exhibitions; and virtual presentation of treasured programs including Art in Bloom, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Freedom Celebration, and the Women’s History Month program, “If It Wasn’t for the Women.” As a result of these offerings, online visits grew to 1.3 million unique views, and more than 250,000 people watched on-demand or livestreamed community and school programs. Of those, 65,000 attended virtual youth and family programs or school tours.

Work on the 140 considerations contained in the Museum’s 2020 Diversity Study Group Report continued throughout the year, with several considerations completed and many others initiated. The purpose of the study was to examine what the Museum is doing to address racial disparities in the St. Louis region and what more can be, and should be, done. To date, 27% of the considerations have been implemented, 21% are actively in progress, and 52% are in the planning phase. Taken together, these efforts involve staff across the institution working collaboratively to build greater racial equity across all areas of operations, including art acquisitions, exhibitions and installations, programs, community outreach and collaboration, fundraising, visitor experience, staffing and recruitment, finance, and facilities management. In collaboration with the Museum’s Chief Diversity Officer, Renee Franklin, I have prioritized implementation of these considerations as a key element in my own work to advance change within our institution.

Expanding our perspective is essential to maintaining the vitality of the Saint Louis Art Museum. I invite you to join us in person or at slam.org to learn more about the vibrant exhibitions and events we offer to engage visitors of every age and background. Your continued engagement is essential to our success, and I am deeply grateful for your support.
